

Observation no: 226

Country-year: Iraq 2002

1. Did the current regime come to power in a military coup?

Yes

The Ba'th came to power in Iraq through a 1968 coup that overthrew President Abdul Rahman Arif.¹

2. Has the country ever experienced a military coup?

Yes.

See answer to question 1. Iraq also experienced multiple coups prior to 1968.

3. Is the country's top leader a former military officer?

No

Saddam had no military background or standing, having failed the entrance exam to the Baghdad Military Academy. He was a military officer in name only, with no training or experience.²

4. Is the military officer corps largely closed to those who do not share the leader's ethnic or sectarian background?

Yes

Iraq's senior officer corps consisted largely of Sunnis who shared the background of Saddam and his predecessor General Ahmed Hassan al-Bakr.

5. Are there strict ideological requirements for entry into the senior officer corps?

Yes

Senior officers were expected to demonstrate complete personal allegiance to Saddam.³

6. Is party membership required for entry into the senior officer corps?

Yes

Senior officers were Ba'th party members.

7. Does military training involve extensive political education or ideological indoctrination?

No

Although personal allegiance to Saddam and acceptance of the tenets of Ba'thism were required, military training in general was lax and perfunctory.⁴

8. Has the military been used to repress internal dissent in the last five years?

Yes

The military was heavily involved in repression of Iraqi Kurds during the late 1980s and Iraqi Shia after a 1991 rebellion, but major military operations against these groups did not occur in the five years preceding the 2003 war.

9. Has the military been used to govern the country in the last five years?

No

Iraq was a firmly civilian-led regime, with a great emphasis on preventing military governance and ensuring political control of the army.⁵

10. Is there a paramilitary organization separate from the regular military, used to provide regime or leader security?

Yes

In 1970 Saddam oversaw the formation of the Popular Army. The nucleus of this paramilitary force had already played key roles in the 1963 coup and in the initial consolidation of Ba'th power in 1968. The Popular Army then became a full-fledged counterweight to the regular military, growing to a strength of 100,000 men by 1979.⁶ The Popular Army came in addition to the Republican Guard inherited from former President Arif. This force would grow from two brigades during the early years of the war to more than two dozen by the end of the Iran-Iraq War.⁷ In the 1990s, the Special Republican Guard also came into being, and the intelligence services developed military-like capabilities as well.⁸

11. Is there an internal intelligence apparatus dedicated to watching the regular military?

Yes

Iraqi intelligence was generally more concerned with tracking political developments inside Iraq and monitoring the loyalty of the armed forces than with gathering information on the Iranians.⁹ This system was clearly still in place prior to the 2003 war.¹⁰

12. Has a purge of the officer corps occurred in the last five years?

No

Although Saddam was certainly no stranger to purges, there is no evidence of a widespread purge in the officer corps prior to the 2003 war, although such purges had occurred at several points in past Iraqi history, such as the late 1970s and late 1980s.

13. Is there an institutionalized forum through which civilian leaders and military officers regularly exchange information?

No

Authoritative histories provide little evidence of well institutionalized civil-military communication. Rather, decision-making power was heavily concentrated in the hands of Saddam and members of his inner circle.¹¹
